In The Homecoming, the irreverent and provocative author Harold Pinter depicts with extreme rawness the thousand and one paradoxes and tensions between a widowed father who lives with two of his adult children and a brother. The arrival of the eldest son, who appears to be the family success, and his wife unleashes a storm, provoked by the suffocating and oppressive atmosphere caused by the jealousy and hatred the members of the family clan feel towards each other.

Nothing like a family reunion to generate tensions in which the literal of what is said and shown expresses as much as what can be inferred behind the glaze of their evocations and insinuations. A hypnotic and seductive play with reality, neurosis and symbolism in which affection and physical and psychological violence confront each other, combine and dissolve in the reencounters, updates and realization of differences that occur in this London home in 1964.

The British playwright and poet Harold Pinter is considered to be the foremost figure of English drama in the second part of the twentieth century. He won numerous awards, including the Nobel Prize of Literature in 2005.
